T.Discrimination of bacterial amastigotes from activated T cells. Mammalian cells infected with intracellular microbes contain large numbers of cells with the morphologic and functional attributes of activated macrophages. We have examined the ability of the cell surface marker E-Cadherin (a neural-cadherin related epitope), which is expressed on activated murine macrophages and activated T cells, to distinguish activated T cells and macrophages from intracellular Leishmania amastigotes by flow cytometry. The present data demonstrated that activated T cells, separated by antisera to E-

Cadherin, were excluded from the Leishmania-infected macrophage populations. In addition, antisera to E-Cadherin but not non-E-Cadherin antisera reduced T cell-mediated cytotoxicity in vitro, while antisera to E-Cadherin, and T cell function, were not mutually exclusive in vivo.

These data indicate that activated T cells are competent effectors of macrophage-mediated leishmanicidal activity, but may be discriminated from the macrophages of Leishmania-infected cells by E-Cadherin.
