Like many other professional software packages, Photoshop is a suite of software products for creating raster images. It uses layers to create complex editing software. Photoshop is a powerhouse tool that is used by professional photographers, graphic designers, illustrators, and other artists. When you create a new Photoshop document, you'll see that Photoshop has the layers bar at the bottom. It's where you lay out your layers to be viewed in the window you create. To create and add layers to a Photoshop document, use the Eyedropper tool, or clicking the Select tool (X), and click on the area you want to create a layer. Then, use the Insert > Layer command to add a new layer. You can drag it over the layer of your choice to place it there. You can also move a layer by clicking and dragging

You can delete layers by selecting them and pressing the Delete key on a keyboard or by right-clicking them and choosing Delete. You can create images at the pixel-level and add effects by using the Eraser tool. Eraser tool enables you to erase entire pixels without destroying them. Click on the NCCN Guidelines Insights: Colorectal Cancer. Clinical practice guidelines for the management of cancer recommend and prescribe systemic therapy for some patients with locally advanced or metastatic disease, particularly those with no symptomatic or medically significant comorbidities. The National Comprehensive Cancer Network (NCCN) guidelines on nonmetastatic colorectal cancer address aspects of care for patients with locally advanced or metastatic disease. This NCCN guideline on locally advanced or metastatic colorectal cancer was written by a multidisciplinary panel of medical oncologists, pathologists, radiation oncologists, surgical oncologists, and clinical nurse specialists. Following a systematic literature review, a targeted evidence synthesis and report writing process, and consideration of expert opinion, the NCCN guidelines discuss issues regarding the use of systemic therapy for patients with locally advanced or metastatic disease, including: colorectal cancer (CRC) defining the use of systemic therapy for patients with locally advanced or metastatic CRC; anti-EGFR therapies for the treatment of CRC; the use of chemotherapy for CRC with local or distant liver metastasis or poorly differentiated histology; fluoropyrimidines for CRC with liver metastasis; metastatic CRC and microsatellite instability status; combination therapy for metastatic CRC; and immunotherapy for patients with metastatic CRC.

[Surgical treatment of lung metastasis from retroperitoneal liposarcoma]. Lung metastasis from retroperitoneal liposarcoma is very rare. We report a case of lung metastasis from retroperitoneal liposarcoma that occurred in a 48-year-old woman. A computed tomography (CT) scan before surgery showed an enhanced tumor mass in the right adrenal gland. A tumor mass measuring 4.2 x 5.2 cm was found in the right upper lobe of the lung. The patient underwent a right upper lobectomy with lymph node dissection. The tumor was well-circumscribed, formed a lobulated mass, and contained lobulated yellow-tan nodules. Histological examination of the tumor revealed spindle cell proliferation, with necrosis and a foamy cytoplasm. The tumor cells had pleomorphism and showed an atypical mitosis, but no atypia or pleomorphism, and no clear necrosis of the tumor cells. The tumor was diagnosed as a well-differentiated liposarcoma. Immunohistochemical examinations showed positive staining for vimentin and S-100 protein, but negative staining for EMA, leukocyte common antigen, factor VIII-related antigen, and CD68. The histological diagnosis of the retroperitoneal liposarcoma was pleomorphic type. The tumor was immunohistochemically positive for bcl-2 protein, but negative for p53 protein. The patient underwent 8 courses of adjuvant chemotherapy and has not had any relapse to date.
