For more Subnautica Silent Running v47282 REPACK UNESCO Director General Irina Bokova has condemned the Sudanese civil war and called on the government and opposition to accept the cease-fire offer. "Our message is simple. It is neither military, nor political. It is human. It is for all people and all nations to help stop the bloodshed, to listen to your communities, to listen to your brothers and sisters, to encourage them to stop the violence, to end the conflict and get down to the business of rebuilding their communities and their country," Bokova said at a press conference at UNESCO headquarters in Paris. 'If peace is what we want' UNESCO Director General Irina Bokova Photo courtesy of UNESCO "We are not saying that you're now at the top of the list. We are not saying that any particular group is more important. What we are saying is that this conflict and this sectarian conflict is sowing seeds of ethnic and religious division. It's sowing an environment of intolerance, of hatred, of fear and of violence. And in that environment, people have paid a very high price." Since January, the government of Sudan and the Sudan People's Liberation Movement, or SPLM, have agreed to a ceasefire with the first of four five-month-long 'observation periods.' "If the offer is serious and if we think that we can have a future here at home without going back to the trenches, then the ceasefire has to be accepted. If we go back to the trenches, we will be in a very difficult position in this country, in the region, and I'm sure in Africa as well," Bokova said.
