With that, the move to native technologies and accelerated workflows is just one part of the overhaul happening with Photoshop. Other ideas include adding advanced capabilities in art direction, authoring, motion graphics and more. Text tools are moving to the GPU, and the Canvas in Photoshop will create a virtual content, including layers, allowing for multiple views of content merged together. It will also allow for creating multiple versions of the frame, so you can make changes before/after. And it'll be easy to switch between layers in your native document. Make Global global smart objects are now possible, which means the user can apply changes or accidentally make changes in your photo, providing a quick and easy way to produce changes that can't be fixed without re-editing. Coupled with layers, the smart object replaces the need for smart filters in many cases. It also allows for easily scoping the area that is interesting, or only the missing pieces. And it'll remove redundant information a user would want to remove. It also lets the user easily scale and resize images. It's especially important as the tools were already extremely optimized for extremely heavy jobs. It was built to work with any kind of render engine, whether it's GPU or CPU based, in a more efficient and scalable way. The advantage of the GPU-based design is that it'll let users scale images quickly, or replace one type of image with another. Users can also easily erase unwanted areas, such as if you're trying to adjust the white balance. It's also more pleasant to tweak the settings of your images, compared to the physical expectation.
